

Researching Children's Dreams

Call for Participants

Does your child have vivid or unusual dreams?

Your child is being invited to participate in a research study that will examine how children ages 8-11 make meaning from dreams or nightmares that are remembered because of their vividness or unusual content. Children who participate will take part in a scheduled, 45 minute interview at their school site, where they will have the opportunity to tell their dream to the researcher, draw a picture of their dream images, and answer two short questionnaires about spiritual awareness, practices and beliefs, which are worded for children. All information will be treated confidentially.

Results from this study can be used to help teachers, parents, psychologists, and others who work with children to listen to children's dreams in a new way to provide support and to encourage their spiritual growth.

The researcher, Cindy Sauln, is a fourth year doctoral student in Clinical Psychology at the Institute of Transpersonal Psychology in Palo Alto, CA. Her clinical experience is working with adults, children and their families in community mental health settings. She is an experienced dreamworker, and is a member of the American Psychological Association, Spiritual Directors International, the Association for Children's Spirituality, the International Association for the Study of Dreams, and the International Expressive Arts Therapy Association. Her special interests include incorporating expressive arts and spirituality in therapy, and exploring the varying ways people of all ages make meaning of their dreams.
